WEDNESDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 24.

THE Roman superstitution that cardinals always die by threes-a similar belief obtains in western waters as to steamboat accidents-is likely to be strengthened by the death of Mgr. Capalti following so closely on those of Cardinals Patrizi and Riario-Sforza, even as but a few weeks before De Angelis and Barizzi followed Antonelli to the grave. The Pope has disproved the traditional assertion with regard to the "years of Peter," but there is another belief connected with the Papal chair that is worth noticing-the belief that if on his elevation to the pontificate a Pope does not change his name his death will follow within the twelvemonth. The first Pope to change his name was Octavian Conti, who succeeded Agapetus II, in 956, and called himself John XII. His example was followed by his successors, and at last the belief became rooted in the popular mind that a Pope who kept his name would die within the year. When Julius Medicis succeeded to Adrian VI he would fain have called himself Julius III, but his friends compelled him to conform with the custom and become Clement VII. Not long after Marcellus Servius was elected to the pontifical chair. He was a young and robust man, who seemed to pay any attention to popular superstitution, and so call ed himself Marcellus II. He died twenty one days after his election, and since his time no Pope has ventured to offend against the tradi-
